Them at all, engage in reading
Them at all, parables demand,

They quite literally can't mean
What they say quite literally.

If you notice in many traditions, the attempt to communicate through a parable is the attempt to communicate a truth that as it were could not possibly be communicated in another sort of more linear form without as it were the aid of a story.

You may, for example, notice that Christ in the New Testament

Parables as you recall, I've drawn on and on about Nietzsche's many styles, but the parable is again a style that Nietzsche uses to convey a kind of truth, a kind of new way of looking at thinkings without as it were the direct communication which I think that he rightly believes views like his cannot receive.

For it's not as though, and this is why I've been so reluctant throughout to present Nietzsche as a philosopher.

I've been equally reluctant, I hope you've noticed, to present

Now, is I said in a certain way, and I did use this example from philosophy, Nietzsche wanted to impossibly play Plato to his own Socrates, to invent himself as such a character that would stand out above the other texts within which his were produced.

And this act of self-creation also occurs in literary figures, or the attempt is made, and I can think of two examples, Proust and James Joyce, where the attempt is made, certainly, to take the stuff of one's own life and to recreate it in a mythical space that is much larger as it were that what someone might call the pathetic embodied ruins of any singular life.

Because at one level, all our lives end in a dirty little tragedy in some corner anyway, in some sense.

So this attempt is in a way, is an attempt to write in such a way as to live beyond oneself and act of self-creation, and I think Joyce and Proust are fair comparisons in some regards to Nietzsche in this way.

I ended as I said, I was going to say a little more about the death of God parable.

become understood in all its dimensions, in its fullness.

In the same way one might say that a very bright child is a project on the way to something, but it's still not fully developed and all the ramifications of what that child will eventually be have not become apparent.

So in something like that way, you could begin with the sociological observation that something profound has shifted somewhere in the 18th, in the transformations from say the 14th through the 18th and 19th centuries and Nietzsche being, as I say, paradigmatically the philosopher of the 20th century even though he died in 1900.

So this event will be, the sociological remark is this, Nietzsche certainly isn't the only one to register a profound shift.

I've already mentioned Max Weber's account of the disenchantment of the world and of how the world is becoming secularized and what, and I think that we don't want to overplay this because we all know that

The embodied and impassioned pull of religion is still very important throughout the world.

Obviously it becomes important in many places in the world.

Weber's point was that religion, when it became one compartment of life and the way that best way to understand that in modern society is there are five days when you work and there's a day when you play, there's a day when you have to do jury duty, a day when you have to vote and then a day to go to church and our lives became as it were Fragmented and compartmentalized into these spheres.

As that happened, which Weber saw as a process of secularization, as religion became, as it were, shrunken to this one day a week observance, regardless of individuals.

You could feel like you're doing it every day, but it's awfully hard as I think a rather minor rock and roll star said, it's awfully hard to be a saint in the city.

Realize himself under those conditions.

So sociologically something has changed that has, you know, something in society and about society has changed in such fundamental ways that the conditions required for god to live and thrive, whatever, if you're just a flat out atheist, it's not going to be helpful because it won't make any sense, but then I find people who are just flat out atheists to be boring, and it's a boring view about anything, I'm sorry, it just bores me.

But so the sociological mark is something really profound, it's changed in the world.

Weber called in the disenchantment of the world, and even though it's old fashioned to mention his name now in the new world order, Marx also noticed a profound change from the feudal to the capitalist mode of production, and he talked about the way that all fast frozen relations and feudalism, all these fixed systems of thought and industry, and there were systems of thought and industry, and worldviews in the medieval

This is not going to get burned by the church because here's the map, it's just like they want, but I'm not going to put a frame around it, it can't be inframed, and so this change, and I've tried to evoke it there, but in sociology it's clear that whatever political position you might take regarding this change to what I will call modernity or modern life is marked by, in Nietzsche's text, at least in part, by the parable of the death of God, by the death of a world in which people could draw meaning from that myth and sects of myth positive answer to that question, well, okay, I agree with you Nietzsche, things have changed, God is dead, we don't know where we're headed, the sky looks like it's getting darker, but I want to know the answer to this classic question raised by St.

Paul, Tolstoy, and Lennon, namely, what is to be done? And believe me, I don't consider that a trivial question, and those three people I just named were not trivial human beings, a very important question, what is to be done? Well, Nietzsche, as I say, being the sort of indirect fellow he was, what he calls a for example, in a text we will discuss later, Nietzsche's Zarathustra, that spoke Zarathustra, he has presented once in that text as the teacher of the eternal recurrence, or the eternal return.

There's always been a kind of scholarly question that philosophers ask and other people interested in the reconstruction of his texts and so on, about whether this is a thesis he holds to the way we hold to a cosmological thesis, you know, about will this really happen kind of question.

Well, the eternal recurrence is, Nietzsche's, for me, is nothing like that for Nietzsche.

This is not a theory about the cosmos, I mean it's not an astronomical theory, it's not a theory about karma or about the great will of becoming returning back again.

I know this much that I'm about to start to gloss and explain the challenge of, I know it as a challenge to self-creation.

It is, as it were, a question that Nietzsche opposes to you it theatrical nature of this challenge because it's it's like the challenge to write about yourself or to make of yourself a character like Hamlet, by the way, let me clear up something in an earlier lecture.

I loved Mel Gibson's Hamlet and as a film, okay, to clear this point up, as a filmed version of Hamlet, it is had in shoulders above the other filmed version because instead of filming a stage play where everyone acts like this, you know, and how you do in theater where you have to emote, in cinema you have to

I MEAN, IF YOU'VE NOTICED THE PLACE, HE HAS MORE THAN ONE, I THINK.

HE HAS, BUT HE'S VERY INTERESTING.

IN ANY CASE, NIETZSCHE'S QUESTION IS, IS YOUR LIFE OF THAT KIND THAT YOU'D BE WILLING TO REPEAT IT OVER AND OVER AGAIN? THIS QUESTION NIETZSCHE FINDS HORRIFYING IN PART BECAUSE THE WORLD HAS CHANGED IN SUCH A WAY AND AMONG ITS CHANGES ARE THE EVERYDAY, AND I SHOULD, I'VE GOT TO MENTION THIS TENSION BETWEEN NIETZSCHE AND THE EVERYDAY,

What it is that it's worst, but at its best boring, uh, under those conditions, can you find a way conceivably to live that you'd be willing to do again and again and again? And as I said, I think Nietzsche has more in mind here than changing jobs.

You know, you go, well, you know, Nietzsche's right.

My god, I've just been at insurance too long.

It's like, it's like that Monty Python skit, the guy who wants to become a lion tamer, he's at accounting.

And he says, Well, maybe she should take a step at a time and go into banking next.

Well, now, this Nietzsche's challenge is more than to change jobs from accounting to banking to even being sort of the captain of a little skin for a year on your, you know, sail, on your savings or whatever.

It's to live a life that is in some sense, and I don't hear, I don't want to even, I hate to use the word art because it trivializes it, but in a way to live a life that's like a work of art, like Kind of life for human beings? Nietzsche thinks there is no general answer to that question, but he thinks it's a supremely important question.

But he doesn't, by general answer, that means there's not one answer that I can find and then I give you the argument and I'll say, oh yeah, that's right, that's the best one, we'll all do it.

Now, this myth takes, this challenge takes place on a different, in a different narrative and with a different kind of challenge.

And in a way, it puts the burden upon the reader, the interpreter, as it were, to ask the question, well, could I love faith that much? That wherever it's put me and whatever it's put before me, I'd be willing to play this drama of self-creation that I've already either attempted or escaped from over and over again.

Now, I think that it is a powerful challenge.

I think if we, the more we think about it, the sort of more horrifying it becomes.

But one reason why nuclear weapons and the specter of an apocalypse was so attractive, utopian and fascinating, and I mean all that seriously.

This is a joke because, look, Hollywood made thousands of movies about apocalypses and people, oh, the missiles of October, I want to see that documentary again, it blew the world up.

And the giddiness of apocalypse and all these movies is sort of based on a point by Sartre.

consciousness that that's what we're doing.

Nietzsche had the misfortune of being supremely, acutely, perhaps pathologically aware, and I mean, I'm certainly pathologically aware, in my opinion, I think all the great theorists and philosophers and literary people, practically all of them, were delusional in one or another important sense of that word, it's okay.

God, what a boring species would be without people who are delusional nuts, if you will, really boring, but Nietzsche was ever lived or was ever likely to live, that someone addicted to self-reflection about their own self-creation.

ACUTELY AWARE OF HIS OWN SELF-CREATION, AND OF COURSE THAT'S WHAT COMES OUT IN THESE VERY HYPERBOLIC STYLE AND THE APHORISMS, AND WHEN NIETZSCHE CALLS HIMSELF, YOU KNOW, IN ONE BOOK HE GIVES IN THE TITLE, BEHOLD THE MAN, AND THE BOOK HAS TITLES LIKE, I MEAN, HAS CHAPTER TITLES LIKE, WHY AM I SO CLEVER?

WHY DO I NEVER MAKE MISTAKES? HE RESPONDS TO HIMSELF BY SAYING, I HAVE NEVER BOTHERED WITH QUESTIONS THAT ARE NOT BEYOND QUESTION THAT I NEVER MAKE MISTAKES, THEY'RE VERY CLEVER.

It was Freud's judgment that he knew more about himself than anyone who ever lived or was ever likely to live.

So what sets the eternal challenge, I mean, the eternal return as a challenge is not just to do the same things you've done, but to be consciously aware of the way a creator is of their creation about yourself, see, with to god to be the creator of you as fallible, finite, and you

In any case, this challenge to create oneself is a magnificent one, and it bears, as I say, striking resemblance to artistic creation.

However, the level of self-consciousness involved is perhaps even greater because when you create a fictional character like Hamlet, the artist can, as it were, distance himself from that creation to a certain extent and always has the alibi of saying, like actresses and actors do, well, I just created that part.

Recurrence is Nietzsche's motto that he was in love with fate or loved fate, the love of fate.

Because for Nietzsche, there is something also fateful about where you find yourself.

You know, I mean, Nietzsche believes that you find yourself, as a matter of fact, growing up in certain communities with certain, you know, linguistic possibilities, historical possibilities, social possibilities, and so on, about which you have no choice.

You know, Heidegger's sort of yucky way of saying this is that you're sort of thrown into the world.

Another way to put the same point is if you've ever seen this game class struggle, a Marxist dice game, you begin by rolling the genetic dice, okay? The high roll, if you roll high, you get, well, first of all, the order in which you roll helps to tell you, you know, something.

You begin rolling with the widest male rolling first, on down to the darker males, and

Is in many ways an exemplary human being, and in this strong sense, that coming from where he came and to engage in that act of self-creation, which the media now goes, oh, well, you know, he puts on a mask, he plays a part.

Well, how long have they been around here? You know, I mean, how long have they been around the United States? I mean, is that supposed to surprise anybody? No, it's that it's the quality of the performance.

I saw him speak once when I was young and, and he was an African American, maybe, it was very dark, you know, black.

And as the photographs of him over the years, now the one used by McDonald's, there's just a hint of things on their lip.

Well, anyway, this long digression is only to give you one of my heroes of self-creation today, someone I really admire, who's engaged in an act of phenomenal, not only self-creation, but recreation, and through a, and through a whole bunch of mistakes, as you

I mean, that's the best example I could find today, and that's a life that might be worth living twice.

Thinking about the great majority that, that toil anonymously day in and day out, it's, it's hard to imagine a life living even the first time, not to mention twice.

So the eternal return in nature, the eternal recurrence of everything is, is supposed to be frightening, and also it's supposed to be a positive moment in nature.

And I'll make a comparison here with David Hume, the British philosopher, the empiricist.

When Hume goes in search of the self empirically, and he knows as an empiricist that he has to find the I, the self, the subject, empirically, he has us do an experiment.

We are to look for it and find our self in this inner space of our mind, where is the I, the self? And Hume performs this experiment in a treatise of Human nature, and damn, there isn't one.

So that makes one become concerned in Nietzsche's way that the various masks, shapes and forms that one does wear and choose in order to become what one is, to use Nietzsche's right in order to become what one is, is not to become an authentic self, but to become the best and most interesting self that you can create.

And it's not, in that sense, it does not belong to the dogmatic tradition of philosophy because god knows what variety of selves would be created if people had the opportunity and the vision and the will and
