Intercalatio: De Loco et Rebus

The courtyard is rectangular.

Stone defines it.

The ground is paved in alternating slabs, light and dark, not perfectly aligned, but consistent enough to be taken as intention.

Water runs through a narrow channel cut into the center.

It moves slowly.

A basin interrupts the channel.

Circular. Shallow. The surface reflects only what is directly above it.

Along the edges: columns, evenly spaced, not identical. Their bases worn differently. Their capitals intact.

Between the columns: air. Light. Dust suspended.

The walls hold markings. Not all are legible. Some are shallow, as if traced once and abandoned. Some are deeper, repeated until the surface gave way.

One mark appears again:

It is not emphasized.

A door is set into the far wall. Wood. Reinforced. Closed.

The handle shows use. The hinges do not. The threshold is worn.

A sound is present.

Not continuous. Not absent.

Drip

The source is not immediately visible. It is not concealed.

In the corner: a vessel, empty or nearly empty. Its interior marked by a line indicating a previous level.

A second vessel nearby. Not aligned. Closer to the wall. Unmarked.

The difference is small.

It remains.

No one enters.

No one leaves.

The arrangement persists. Not perfectly. Sufficiently.

Drip

Nothing is explained.

Nothing requires explanation.

Incoherentia I: De Pulsu et Causa

Midday in Córdoba. The light falls not gently but with incision, dividing the courtyard into regions of clarity and remainder. Limestone returns the sun without mercy. Edges declare themselves. Surfaces admit no ambiguity.

Beneath a stretched canvas awning there is arranged a table of modest dimension yet exact proportion. Upon it are laid instruments not in ornament but in sequence: brass, linen, ceramic, water. Each object occupies a place that is neither arbitrary nor explained. The order is sufficient.

Averroes sits cross-legged. The posture is not affectation but economy. His hands bear the record of repetition: ink embedded in the folds, faint scars crossing the knuckles where blade has met resistance. He does not display them. They are already known.

Before him, a man of labor. The shoulder is swollen, the skin drawn taut and bright with heat. The body speaks in gradients.

Around them, students in a semicircle. Their arrangement is not symmetrical, yet it resolves into balance. They lean forward not in unison but in convergence.

At the rear, a figure remains still. Hood drawn. Presence withheld rather than concealed.

Averroes takes the patient's wrist. Thumb and forefinger find the pulse without search. His eyes close, not in contemplation but in subtraction.

There is no sound of the pulse. Yet the air acquires a rhythm, faintly, as though breath itself had been persuaded into measure.

He releases the wrist.

He does not immediately look at the wound.

He looks instead to the basin of water. Then to the angle of shadow cast along the wall. Time is read indirectly, as one reads the consequence rather than the declaration.

AVERROES

The pulse is fast but regular. The heat is localized. The skin is red, not darkened. This tells us the body is reacting, not failing.

A student leans forward. The question arrives already sharpened.

STUDENT

Master, how can we be certain this reaction is the ~~sign~~, and not merely the sign?

Averroes turns. Slowly. Not to correct, but to preserve the question from collapse.

AVERROES

Because signs repeat. Causes persist. If you confuse them, you will chase shadows until the patient dies of patience.

A murmur, restrained. Some assent, some hesitation. The distinction has not yet settled.

STUDENT

But some say illness is a test. That the body suffers because God wishes it so.

The statement does not disrupt the circle. It diffuses through it, finding places to rest.

Averroes adjusts his grip on the lancet. Not defensive. Grounding.

AVERROES

If you believe that, you may pray. Prayer is not forbidden here.

A pause. Not rhetorical. Functional.

AVERROES

But if you stay, you will observe first. Intention does not substitute for attention.

He raises the lancet. The blade receives the light and returns it without distortion.

AVERROES

This tool has no theology. It cuts whether you are righteous or cruel. That is not blasphemy. That is reliability.

The incision is small. Exact. The patient flinches, then exhales as pressure releases. Fluid emerges, dark, edged with amber. It collects without urgency.

The courtyard contracts, then resumes.

Averroes cleans the wound. The gesture is continuous, unbroken by commentary.

At the edge of the courtyard, in shadow, a vessel releases water into another. Drop by drop. No emphasis is given. No explanation offered.

The sound is present.

AVERROES

When you see suffering, do not ask first what God intends. Ask what the body is doing. Healing leaves traces. So does decay.

A beat.

AVERROES

If you refuse to read those traces, you will call ignorance piety and negligence humility.

The binding is applied. Firm, but not excessive.

The patient nods. Gratitude expressed without words.

Students disperse, slowly, carrying fragments of the demonstration with them. Not all fragments are compatible.

The hooded figure remains.

Averroes packs his instruments. Each returned to its place, though no place has been declared.

He pauses.

Not turning.

Acknowledgment withheld, or deferred.

The vessel continues its work.

Drip.

Drip.

Drip.

Incoherentia II: De Lege et Negligentia

The light that enters the hall is the same light as in the courtyard, yet it arrives disciplined. It is filtered through lattice and divided into geometry. What was previously direct is now mediated.

The air is cooler. Not by accident, but by construction.

Bodies are arranged in rows, each posture calibrated to signal attention without intimacy. Scrolls are present, but unopened. Authority resides not in reading, but in the possibility of reference.

At the center, elevated without ostentation, sits Averroes.

The instruments have changed. The hands have not.

Before him stand two men. Between them, an absence: a wall that once held.

JUNIOR JURIST

The matter before the court concerns injury sustained during the collapse of a retaining wall on the eastern works. The question is whether $\pi\epsilon\lambda\epsilon\gamma\iota\alpha$ may be assigned.

The word does not settle easily. It remains suspended, as though awaiting a structure capable of receiving it.

AVERROES

Let the builder speak.

The builder does not look at the injured man. His gaze fixes just above the assembly, as if addressing a height that might absolve him.

BUILDER

The wall stood as walls stand. Stone upon stone. Mortar mixed as my father taught me. It fell because God willed it to fall.

A murmur. Not resistance. Relief.

The statement requires no verification.

BUILDER

Who am I to argue with the decree of the Most High?

The laborer shifts. Pain is visible, but not yet admissible.

LABORER

I was beneath it, my lord. I heard a crack before it fell. Like dry wood.

The builder's jaw tightens.

BUILDER

Stone cracks when God commands it.

Averroes lowers his eyes. The stylus marks the tablet. The motion is small, but not negligible.

AVERROES

How long had the wall stood?

BUILDER

Two seasons. Nearly three.

AVERROES

And the mortar?

BUILDER

Lime and sand. As always.

AVERROES

From which quarry came the stone?

The hesitation is brief. It is sufficient.

BUILDER

The northern cut. Cheaper transport.

Averroes looks up. Not accusing. Locating.

AVERROES

The northern stone fractures along internal seams when improperly cured. It demands thicker mortar and longer setting time.

The room tightens. A structure begins to form.

JUNIOR JURIST

Qadi, if I may—does this not presume that the wall obeys אלוהים rather than divine immediacy?

The question does not seek answer alone. It seeks boundary.

Averroes does not respond immediately. He looks instead at the laborer's arm.

AVERROES

If I said the arm broke because God willed it, would you refuse the splint?

Unease enters. It does not dissipate.

JUNIOR JURIST

No, my Lord, but—

AVERROES

Then you already believe that God's will includes אִי־טִרְדָּה.

A pause. Longer than required.

AVERROES

Law cannot function if injury is inscrutable. If every collapse is miracle, then no craft exists—only luck and prayer.

He turns to the builder.

AVERROES

You chose cheaper stone. You reduced mortar. You hurried the setting. These are אֵלֵּי.

The word does not dissolve.

AVERROES

God did not conceal them from you.

The builder bows. The motion is correct. The interior is not.

Averroes writes.

AVERROES

Judgment: אֶלֶּלֶה.

Compensation is owed. The injured man will receive wages for the season lost, paid by the builder's guild.

The stylus presses more firmly than before.

The word remains.

The laborer exhales. Relief and disbelief coexist without resolving. The builder withdraws. Containment replaces defense.

The court prepares to proceed. Continuity reasserts itself.

Yet something has been introduced that does not return to prior state.

JUNIOR JURIST

Qadi... some will say that this ruling limits God.

Averroes looks at him. Not as superior, but as instrument.

AVERROES

No.

A pause.

AVERROES

It limits $\epsilon\gamma\epsilon\mu\epsilon\epsilon$.

Silence. Not absence of sound, but suspension of interpretation.

At the side wall, recessed in stone, a vessel continues its work.

The same rhythm as before.

Yet now it is no longer ignorable.

Drip.

Drip.

Drip.

Incoherentia III: De Voce et Flumine

The street does not admit geometry.

Where the court imposed alignment, the market dissolves it. Movement replaces arrangement. Sound replaces structure. The air is no longer divided but saturated.

Vendors speak across one another without conflict. Calls overlap, not as argument but as accumulation. Meaning does not reside in sequence, but in density.

Averroes walks without escort. His pace is neither hurried nor slow. It adjusts, continuously, to the flows it encounters.

The smell of spice, leather, heat, and dust forms a composite that resists separation.

At the far end of the street, a voice rises.

Not louder than the others.

But it does not dissipate.

PREACHER

[illegible]

Some turn. Not all.

The voice continues, uninterrupted by the lack of universal attention.

PREACHER

רמזדו לי רמלנא לא רב וילי T_L , וליני: $x=700$ ון זארוורקז רב ון T_L , וליני: $L=כלא x=700$ ווג זא-רג רב ון זא 675
 $T|J_1$ גאליין ווי $=700$

Averroes does not stop.

But his trajectory bends.

PREACHER

[illegible]

The word emerges again, but it does not stabilize the line.

PREACHER

[illegible]

A small crowd gathers. Not in formation. In attraction.

00000 000 00000 00 00000 00000000 0000 0000 00000000 0000 00000 000000 00000 00000 00000 00000 000 0000.

The Arabic does not translate. It expands.

PREACHER

וחדר לאבצרל ודורחז בדו ליבזלג בלריווי זיונג בל, ודורלכאאארון אמלש בדו ליבזלג וורוראלי לללי בל
רילנל בדו זי בדו דר ראבזלג ודו וויכ זיאקלי לדר

A man laughs. Not in mockery. In recognition.

PREACHER

רבי ודו ילדל לעזאק לדר זא רחד? ראנג ודו ילדל לאל לדר זא רחד? ראבזלג ודו ילדל ח זא רחד רבי אדורא רבדורחז ואלר לדר זיאקלש זרי וויכ אלר זיאקלי לדר זא רחד?

The words do not resolve into argument. They circulate.

Averroes stops.

Not at the center. Slightly to the side.

AVERROES

If the blade does not cut, then it is no longer a blade.

The preacher turns.

The space between them does not close.

PREACHER

זלזאונלני ודלד וויכ ח זיאקלש זא,

AVERROES

Then no command could be trusted. Not even yours.

A pause.

The crowd leans without moving.

PREACHER

בדל דר ודלדל זא ח, זיאקלי לדר דר ודלדל ודו זא ריבא,

AVERROES

And yet you speak to men.

The preacher smiles. Not concession. Not victory.

Continuation.

PREACHER

ווריווי ודלד ליבזלג,

The answer does not close the exchange. It redirects it into a space without boundary.

0 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12 13 14 15 16 17 18 19 20 21 22 23 24 25 26 27 28 29 30 31

The crowd thickens. Not uniformly.

Some withdraw. Some advance. No equilibrium is reached.

AVERROES

If there is no μ -rule, then there is no medicine. No craft. No law.

PREACHER

יִינִיחַ = נֶאֱדָר וְלִין וְלֶדֶר

The words do not strike. They dissolve and reappear in different positions.

PREACHER

[illegible]

Averroes does not respond.

Not because there is nothing to say.

Because the form of response has been displaced.

The sound of water returns.

Not Localized.

Distributed.

Drip.

From somewhere unseen.

Drip.

Not synchronized with itself.

Drip.

The crowd begins to move again. Not dispersing. Reconfiguring.

The preacher continues speaking.

But now the words are no longer contained within the figure.

They appear in fragments, carried by others, altered, repeated, misremembered.

17 י"ז, 17 י"ח, 17 י"ט.

7111 1111,

7111 171,

Averroes resumes walking.

The street does not restore his path.

He exits not by completion, but by divergence.

Incoherentia IV: De Scriptura et Fragmento

The library is not silent.

It contains silence.

Between movements. Between the turning of pages. Between the settling of dust that does not cease to fall.

Shelves rise beyond immediate perception, not because they are infinite, but because they refuse to resolve into a single field of view. Knowledge is stored not as unity, but as adjacency.

Averroes enters without announcement.

He does not search.

He navigates.

A table stands near the center. Upon it: a manuscript, partially unrolled. Not new. Not ancient. In a state that resists classification.

The ink varies.

Not in color.

In intention.

AVERROES

Who has been working here?

No answer.

Not absence. Deferral.

He sits.

The manuscript does not present itself linearly. Sections begin without origin. End without closure.

He reads.

On the persistence of ~~line~~ across apparent interruption...

The line ends.

Not with punctuation.

With vacancy.

Averroes does not react to the marginal note.

He continues.

If one assumes that the world proceeds by והיחלפות, then one must also assume that deviation is either illusion or ignorance.

A second hand enters.

Not physically.

Graphically.

7x xL±LLןל.

Averroes places his hand flat on the page.

Not to stop the text.

To locate it.

AVERROES

This is not commentary.

A pause.

AVERROES

This is intrusion.

From the far end of the table, a voice.

Not Loud.

Already present.

IBN ARABI

Or completion.

Averroes does not look up immediately.

He finishes the line that does not end.

AVERROES

Completion does not erase the original.

IBN ARABI

[illegible]

Averroes lifts his hand.

The page beneath has shifted.

Not position.

Content.

If one assumes that the world proceeds by וירדיות, then one must also assume that deviation is the failure of perception.

The earlier sentence is not present.

Not crossed out.

Not corrected.

Absent.

00 00000 00 000000 000 00000 000 000000.

Averroes turns the page.

The text fragments further.

Columns appear without alignment.

The physician observes recurrence. והוא אומר שיש חזרה על המחלה.

Below them, a third line.

Centered.

Unstable.

האם זהו סוף? או שיש עוד?

Averroes closes the manuscript.

Not abruptly.

As one closes a door that does not fully seal.

AVERROES

You have altered the text.

IBN ARABI

האם זהו סוף? או שיש עוד?

AVERROES

You have made it unreliable.

IBN ARABI

האם זהו סוף? או שיש עוד?

A silence follows.

Not empty.

Layered.

Averroes opens the manuscript again.

The pages are no longer in sequence.

Some repeat.

Some contradict.

Some refuse to align with the page margins.

000 0000 00 0000 00 00 0000 000000 00 00 00000.

A drop of water falls onto the page.

No source is visible.

The ink does not blur.

It shifts.

٧٢٤٤ appears again.

But not where it was written.

Averroes watches.

Not the word.

Its relocation.

AVERROES

IF the text does not hold, then nothing holds.

IBN ARABI

7x LLLx/117174 57L5, 17 6 515=LLxL77 4111,

The manuscript remains open.

It does not invite further reading.

It persists.

Somewhere above, unseen, the sound continues.

Drip.

This time, onto parchment.

Drip.

The page absorbs nothing.

Drip.

Yet the text has changed.

Incoherentia V: De Multiplicatione Narrationum

The fountain did not remain where it occurred.

It moved.

Not in stone or water, but in speech.

At the northern market, it was said that the water rose before the call to prayer.

At the southern gate, it was said that the call itself caused the rising.

In the quarter of the leather workers, the story was told differently again: that the water hesitated, as if awaiting permission.

No one described the same sequence.

No one described a different event.

FIRST MERCHANT

It rose all at once. No delay. As if it had been waiting.

SECOND MERCHANT

No, there was a pause. A moment where nothing happened. Then suddenly—

FIRST MERCHANT

—then suddenly, yes, but not as you say. It was already rising.

The disagreement does not resolve.

It does not escalate.

It persists.

Aisha stands among them.

She does not correct.

She listens.

SECOND MERCHANT

I saw it. The basin was still. Then the sound came. Then the water moved.

THIRD MERCHANT

There was no sound. Only the motion.

FIRST MERCHANT

The motion was the sound.

The accounts do not cancel.

They accumulate.

0 0000 0000 00 00 0000 00000.

Aisha writes without looking at the page.

זאלאנאז 7דא ליגדור ון ריטלין לעמדי לער ריג זאלענעמדי רימדי ולי, וליאלי ווימאז ווי ון אלניגלג יאז ווילגל לער

She stops.

Reads what she has written.

The sentences are not the sentences she intended.

They are not wrong.

They are not hers.

AISHA

Which account do you believe?

SECOND MERCHANT

ALL of them. None of them. Does it matter?

A pause that functions as an answer.

The fountain has become multiple.

Not in reality.

In reconstruction.

water rises

water obeys

וַיִּשְׁמַר מֹשֶׁה וְאַהֲרֹן כְּכָל אֲשֶׁר צִוָּה יְהוָה וְהָעָם נִשְׁמְרוּ

The sentences begin to align.

Then drift.

Aisha steps back.

The crowd fills the space.

The stories continue without her.

She listens once more.

Not for the content.

For the pattern.

A repetition.

A shift.

A repetition again.

וְיִשְׁמַע הָאָז הַזֶּה, וְיִשְׁמַע הָאָז הַזֶּה, וְיִשְׁמַע הָאָז הַזֶּה, וְיִשְׁמַע הָאָז הַזֶּה, וְיִשְׁמַע הָאָז הַזֶּה,

The sound returns.

Drip.

A pause.

Drip.

Not from the fountain.

Drip.

From somewhere else.

Incoherentia VI: De Defectu et Calibratione

The first account did not circulate.

It failed.

Not publicly.

Not visibly.

But those present did not repeat it.

A basin was prepared.

The pipes aligned.

The timing observed.

The call was given.

Nothing happened.

A delay.

A second call.

A slight movement.

Not upward.

Sideways.

OBSERVER

It shifted.

SECOND OBSERVER

No, it trembled.

THIRD OBSERVER

It prepared.

The words do not coincide.

The water does not rise.

The pressure-

The sentence halts.

ENGINEER

THIRD OBSERVER

The possibilities multiply.

The event does not.

The engineer adjusts the valve.

Slightly.

A third call.

The water rises.

Cleanly.

Too cleanly.

FIRST OBSERVER

It obeyed.

SECOND OBSERVER

It corrected.

THIRD OBSERVER

It revealed itself.

The earlier failure does not disappear.

It is not repeated.

לשם הבהרה, המעשה המתואר הוא תוצאה של תהליך מתמש, ולא של אירוע בודד. המעשה מתואר כאירוע בודד, אך הוא מתמש. המעשה מתואר כאירוע בודד, אך הוא מתמש. המעשה מתואר כאירוע בודד, אך הוא מתמש.

The account that leaves the courtyard is singular.

MESSENGER

The water rose at the call.

Nothing else travels with it.

Not the delay.

Not the sideways motion.

Not the adjustment.

אָקאונט פֿאַרפֿאַכט

Aisha hears the report later.

She reconstructs.

AISHA

There must have been—

She pauses.

Not for lack of explanation.

For excess.

[illegible]

She sketches the basin.

The pipes.

The angles.

The lines do not align.

She redraws them.

They align.

The water rises when pressure exceeds resistance.

Below:

אָקאונטס פאַרשטאַנד

Incoherentia VII: De Observatione et Dispositione

Aisha returns to the fountain.

Not to see it.

To see how it is seen.

The basin is still.

No call.

No crowd.

Only the structure remains.

באסין הבסיס

טִּיבִּים pipes remain

טַרְטַר pressure waits

She walks around it.

Stops.

Steps back.

The angle changes.

The basin does not.

[illegible]

She marks the ground.

A point.

Another.

A third.

The alignment shifts.

From here, the water would appear to rise directly upward.

Below, written later:

Aisha Looks again.

The marks are still there.

But—

She moves to a third position.

From here, the basin appears slightly tilted.

The tilt is not in the stone.

[illegible]

Aisha closes one eye.

Then the other.

The basin shifts.

0 □ □ □ □ □ □ □ □ □ □ □ □ □ □ □ □ □ □ □ .

She writes quickly now.

The phrases repeat.

Not identically.

אָקאונט רעפּלאַס אַ פֿעלד

The structure stabilizes.

Then—

The water rises when pressure exceeds resistance.

Aisha stops writing.

The right column remains stable.

---הוא לא מזהה את המילה, אבל הוא מזהה את המילה, והוא מזהה את המילה, והוא מזהה את המילה, והוא מזהה את המילה---

She draws a line between the two columns.

The line does not separate them.

AISHA

If both are true—

She stops.

AISHA

—or if distinction is not—

The sentence does not complete.

000 0000 0000000 0000 000000.

A shadow passes across the basin.

No source is visible.

היא מזהה את המילה
Aisha looks down.

Her earlier marks—

They are not aligned.

Or she is not where she was.

היא position shifts

היא relation changes

היא event remains

The basin is unchanged.

The marks—

—are no longer in the same configuration.

היא delay precedes

היא rise follows

היא account replaces

Then:

היא account precedes

The two sequences do not cancel.

They persist.

לַדֵּי sequences hold

Aisha closes the notebook.

Opens it.

The sequences remain.

But—

The sound returns.

A second—

Drip.

A third—

Drip.

Not evenly spaced.

Not fully separate.

Incoherentia VIII: De Necessitate Retroactiva

The study is quiet.

Not peaceful.

Suspended.

Averroes reads back through what he has written.

The words are unchanged.

But certain of them—

-carry more weight than before.

Not because they have been altered.

[illegible]

He sets down the manuscript.

Picks it up.

If one assumes that the world proceeds by וירדיות, one must also assume that deviation is הטעות illusion אי ignorance.

He did not write it that way.

He did.

And the binding has changed around the words.

Aisha enters.

She reads the passage over his shoulder without announcement.

AISHA

This reads differently than yesterday.

AVERROES

I have not changed it.

Averroes stops writing.

AVERROES

If this continues-

He does not finish.

The sentence continues.

[illegible]

Aisha closes the notebook.

Opens it.

The lines are the same.

The structure-

The sound returns.

¹Editorial interpolation (anachronistic): The conditions here described correspond, in later scientific terminology, to aphantasia and anendophasia. Aphantasia denotes the absence or severe attenuation of voluntary visual imagery, associated in contemporary accounts with reduced activation in occipital-parietal networks during imagery tasks, despite intact visual perception. Anendophasia refers to the absence of inner speech—the lack of a phonologically instantiated internal narrator—suggesting that linguistic cognition may proceed via non-phonological representations or direct conceptual activation without subvocal rehearsal.

At the historical moment of the present text, such variations in cognitive architecture were neither formally classified nor widely recognized. Intellectual culture operated under an implicit assumption that imagination and inner narration were universal faculties. Their absence, when encountered, would not have been named as a condition, but experienced as a structural anomaly—one that resists both description and transmission within prevailing conceptual frameworks.

The present fragment should therefore not be read as a diagnosis, but as an early encounter with non-universal cognition within a world that presumes its universality.

Incoherentia XII: De Scripturis et Formis Litterarum in Archivo Fontium

In the middle years of the compilation, when the manuscript had already begun to exhibit signs of internal divergence, the Editor records a discovery not of narrative content, but of the instruments through which narrative itself is made manifest. These were not found in the body of the text, nor in its marginal apparatus, but in a subdirectory of the archive, designated simply as `fonts/`, as though the naming itself sought to conceal the gravity of its contents beneath an ordinary sign.

Within this directory were gathered a multiplicity of scriptural forms, each encoded in files bearing the extensions `.ttf` and others more obscure, suggesting not merely variation of appearance but divergence of ontological regime. The Editor, proceeding in the manner of the scholastics, did not at first distinguish between them by aesthetic quality, but by function, comportment, and the manner in which each seemed to impose constraints upon the text it rendered.

Foremost among these was the family designated `Sga-Regular`, present in several instantiations. This script, which the Editor identifies with the Standard Galactic hand, exhibits a character of rigid clarity and geometric finality. Its glyphs appear less written than לִיבְיָאֵלֶיךָ, as though each letter were the projection of a more primitive symbolic order. When passages are rendered in this form, ambiguity diminishes, yet at the same time the text becomes resistant to paraphrase, as if each sign were bound to a singular and irreducible וְיִשְׁמַחֲכֶם. It is therefore associated with the underlying structure of the manuscript, that which persists even when interpretation fails.

In contrast, the script preserved as `CursiveGalactic-Regular.ttf` is of a markedly different nature. Its lines flow and interweave, and its characters seem less discrete than continuous, as though each were the residue of motion rather than the product of intention. וְיִשְׁמַחֲכֶם דְּרֹחַ, וְיִשְׁמַחֲכֶם דְּרֹחַ וְיִשְׁמַחֲכֶם דְּרֹחַ וְיִשְׁמַחֲכֶם דְּרֹחַ, וְיִשְׁמַחֲכֶם דְּרֹחַ וְיִשְׁמַחֲכֶם דְּרֹחַ. The Editor therefore assigns to this script the domain of transition, wherein the text has not yet settled into fixed form, and where interpretation must proceed by following trajectories rather than identifying points.

A third principal form is encountered in `NovaMonoStandardGalactic.ttf`, which unites the monospaced discipline of Nova Mono with the glyphic repertoire of the Galactic script. Here, each character occupies an equal measure of space, producing a lattice-like regularity that suggests computation or enumeration. Yet within this grid, the foreign shapes of the Galactic letters introduce a tension between uniform spacing and non-uniform meaning. The Editor remarks that texts rendered in this form often present themselves as stable, yet conceal within their regularity a deeper incoherence, detectable only when one attends to the mismatch between alignment and sense.

Among the ancillary forms, the Amiri family presents a script of classical dignity, reminiscent of juridical or theological treatises. Its curves and proportions evoke continuity with earlier traditions, and passages rendered therein acquire an air of authority, whether or not such authority is warranted. It is therefore frequently employed in sections where the manuscript feigns coherence, adopting the voice of established doctrine even as it quietly undermines it.

The scripts designated Cheiro-Regular and Clypto-Regular appear to belong to a more enigmatic lineage. Their forms suggest systems of encoding or cipher, and indeed the Editor notes that passages rendered in these hands often resist immediate comprehension, yielding their sense only through repeated inspection or cross-reference. They are thus associated with the hidden strata of the text, where meaning is not absent but $\tau L = L \times \times L \tau$.

Particular attention is given to Logico_philosophicus-Regular.ttf, whose very name invokes the ambition of total systematization. The glyphs here are austere, almost diagrammatic, and passages composed in this script tend toward propositions, enumerations, and structures that aspire to closure. Yet, as the Editor observes, such closure is never complete; םֿװ ןֿױן ךֿ׳ ןֿײַ ןֿ׳ ןֿ״ ןֿ׵ ןֿ׶ ןֿ׷ ןֿ׸ ןֿ׹ ןֿ׺ ןֿ׻ ןֿ׼ ןֿ׽ ןֿ׾ ןֿ׿ ןֿװ ןֿױן ןֿײַ ןֿ׳ ןֿ״ ןֿ׵ ןֿ׶ ןֿ׷ ןֿ׸ ןֿ׹ ןֿ׺ ןֿ׻ ןֿ׼ ןֿ׽ ןֿ׾ ןֿ׿

Likewise, `Systada-Regular.ttf`, described in the accompanying log as terminal-friendly, introduces a script adapted to mechanical environments. Its characters are optimized for legibility under constraint, and texts rendered therein often take on the aspect of commands, logs, or outputs. In these passages, the manuscript appears to address not a reader but a process, as though the act of reading had been displaced into execution.

Finally, there are forms such as `shapeform.ttf` and `dactyl.ttf`, whose glyphs exhibit experimental or incomplete qualities. These are treated by the Editor not as finished scripts but as traces of a generative process, remnants of an attempt to discover new alphabets rather than merely deploy existing ones. Their presence suggests that the manuscript is not only written but continually rewriting the very means of its own לרשף לרשף.

From these observations, the Editor concludes that the fonts are not interchangeable vessels for a preexisting text, but active participants in its formation. Each imposes constraints, affords possibilities, and alters the space of meanings that can be realized. To read the manuscript without regard to the script in which it is rendered is therefore to ignore a primary dimension of its אֲשֶׁר הָיָה.

And it is further noted, though not proven, that in certain passages the transformation from one script to another does not merely represent a change in presentation, but corresponds to a transition in the state of the narrative itself, as though the text, encountering a failure of coherence, were compelled to seek refuge in another form of לשון.

Incoherentia XIII: De Interruptione et Aula

The library of the great mosque admitted light only under conditions. It did not receive illumination as the courtyard received it, in sheets and verdicts, but in measured incursions: through screens, over shelves, across the upper edges of bindings whose leather had absorbed the handling of generations until touch itself seemed to have darkened them. The room was disciplined not by silence, for silence can be dramatic, but by the mutual agreement of surfaces to withhold excess.

The Prosecutor stood between two columns of shelving and read a page he had already read twice. The words did not resist him. Their grammar remained in order. Their arguments advanced with the familiar sequence of premise, distinction, reply. Yet beneath the page, or perhaps between the lines in a manner no longer reducible to placement, another measure persisted.

Drip.

He did not look up.

The sound was too regular to be miraculous and too patient to be ignored. It did not belong to the disputation before him, and yet it slowly removed from that disputation the comfort of self-containment. He read again the sentence under his thumb. The ink did not move. The meaning did.

PROSECUTOR

If the order is divinely sustained, then interruption is impossible except by will.

The sentence would have held had it remained merely doctrinal. But the final word, which should have closed the proposition with the force of habit, displayed a minute defection. Not a whole word. Not even a whole sign. Only one interior letter had shifted, unnoticed by any eye not already injured by attention:

will

The anomaly did not declare itself. It did not spread. It simply remained, too small for the dignity of refutation, too exact for dismissal.

He turned the page. The next folio was innocent. The next after that was innocent also.

The clepsydra stood in the recess beyond the lattice, barely visible except where the water caught a narrow seam of light and converted it into duration.

Drip.

PROSECUTOR

It is a clock.

No one had spoken to him. The statement entered the room not as reply but as self-defense. He set the folio down. Across the low table, a student copyist kept working, his reed pen lifting and returning with such exact intervals that it seemed for a moment that ink and water had been recruited into the same argument.

000 00 000000 000.

The Prosecutor turned. An old librarian, neither summoned nor introduced, adjusted a stack of quires without once looking at him.

PROSECUTOR

No.

He regretted the speed of the answer.

PROSECUTOR

No, but every sign of order may be taken for one.

The librarian did not respond. He left one codex open, face down, as if the page itself were not worth preserving in a single orientation.

The Prosecutor resumed reading. He found that he could still produce every expected distinction. Secondary causes. Primary cause. Means. End. Permission. Will. He could arrange them all with perfect rhetorical obedience. What disturbed him was not that the system had failed, but that it could now be imitated by things that lacked sanctity.

Drip.

He closed the book more forcefully than the room allowed.

The Caliph's garden was geometry made merciful by water. Channels divided the earth into lucid quadrants. Cypress held the vertical with judicial restraint. The air itself appeared adjudicated: nothing stray, nothing wind-broken, every leaf either admitted or excluded from the pattern.

Averroes walked beside the channel without looking at it. That abstention, in the garden, carried more force than admiration would have carried.

The Caliph stopped at a crossing of the water paths where four narrow streams met under a carved stone lip and separated again without confusion.

CALIPH

You see? Even abundance submits to form.

AVERROES

Water submits to gradient.

CALIPH

And who gives the world its gradients?

Averroes did not answer immediately. The pause did not read as caution. It read as a refusal to honor the false economy of the question.

AVERROES

If I say God, you will think I have agreed with you. If I say nature, you will think I have denied Him. Neither would be exact.

Even the spacing between lines, unusually even to the eye, seemed to have entered the service of the garden's discipline.

CALIPH

Awe governs more quickly.

AVERROES

So does fear.

CALIPH

Fear exhausts itself.

AVERROES

Then awe exhausts what remains.

CALIPH

You still believe consistency can rule men.

AVERROES

No.

AVERROES

Consistency is what makes mercy possible.

For one instant the sentence restored the world to legibility. The garden resumed its rightful scale. Water was again water, not theater. Stone was stone, not symbol. Even the earlier defect inside the word will seemed retrospectively correctable, a mere blemish in copying rather than a structural tear.

Then the channel nearest them admitted a leaf where no leaf should have entered. It did not obstruct the flow. It merely failed to belong.

Zaynab found Saladin in the narrower court beyond the kitchen wall. His bandaged hand rested on his knee. He had the stillness of someone who has learned that motion invites further interpretation.

She crouched without tenderness and without hardness.

Pain has causes. So does silence.

Saladin looked at her as if the line had not been spoken but set down between them in a hand more private than speech.

SALADIN

I said nothing.

That is why I asked.

SALADIN

You did not ask.

She unwrapped the cloth, inspected the swelling, and rewrapped it with a pressure that was nearly impersonal and therefore more kind than comfort would have been.

SALADIN

And silence?

She tightened the final turn, then said, in a line that broke itself at the hinge and forced the ear to reverse direction before the syntax could resume:

ZAYNAB

Silence is what remains when a man discovers that قدصي هاري ام لك سيل what he sees.

He frowned, not because the sentence was obscure, but because it had returned to him in another order than the one in which it had departed her mouth.

Drip.

This time the sound could not be placed. Not library. Not basin. Not wound. It had become distributive, attached not to an object but to a condition of the chapter itself.

Saladin rose.

In rising, he disturbed nothing.

That was what frightened him most.

Interludium: De Fuga

The door was marked before sunset.

Aisha saw it from across the narrow street, just as the last light slipped along the plaster walls and gathered in the shallow cracks near the threshold. At first she thought it was shadow, or some trick of the evening glow, but as she moved closer the color resolved into something deliberate—thick, uneven, unmistakable.

Red.

Not painted. Applied.

She stopped a few paces away and did not touch it.

Behind her, the city continued as it always did at that hour. Vendors calling out the last of their goods, shutters closing, the slow reshaping of noise into something quieter but no less dense. Nothing in the rhythm of Córdoba suggested that anything had changed.

Which meant everything had.

She turned the handle and entered.

Inside, the house was already in motion. Her father had not waited. Scrolls were stacked in careful bundles across the low table, each tied with a strip of linen and marked in a hand that was more compressed than usual, as if time itself had narrowed the space available for writing.

Averroes stood near the center of the room, holding a manuscript open but not reading it.

"You saw it," he said, without turning.

Aisha closed the door behind her.

"Yes."

"They chose visibility," she added. "Not force."

Now he turned.

"That is force," he said. "Applied differently."

From the courtyard came the faint sound of movement—someone passing too slowly, or stopping where there was no reason to stop. Aisha moved to the window and shifted the lattice just enough to see.

Two men stood across the street, speaking in low tones. They were not dressed as officials. That was part of the point.

"They're not hiding it," she said.

"No," Averroes replied. "They don't need to."

A sound at the door. Not a knock. Something lighter. A signal, perhaps.

Aisha moved before he did, crossing the room and opening it just enough to admit a figure from the street.

Zaynab slipped inside without a word, her expression composed but tight at the edges.

"They've started," she said.

"Where?" Aisha asked.

"The market first. Then the western quarter." Zaynab set a small satchel on the table. "Confiscations. Not systematic yet. But moving."

Averroes closed the manuscript in his hands.

"Then we leave tonight."

She gathered the bundles. Their weight distributed between them.

"Father," she said.

He looked at her.

"If they had not done this—would you have stayed?"

The question hung between them, more dangerous than the noise outside.

"For a time," he said. "Long enough to finish what could be finished."

"And now?"

"Now," he said, "it will be finished elsewhere."

Zaynab moved to the door, listening.

"Wait," she said.

They did.

Footsteps passed. Slower this time. Deliberate.

Then silence.

"Now," Zaynab said.

They stepped into the street together.

The red mark on the door caught the last of the fading light, darker now, almost indistinguishable from shadow.

Aisha did not look back.

They moved north.

Behind them, Córdoba continued—its streets filling, emptying, reforming—unchanged in appearance, altered in structure.

Ahead, the road narrowed, then opened, then disappeared into darkness.

They followed it anyway.

They stopped before dawn, not because they had reached a destination, but because the road had narrowed into something that no longer required speed.

The cart had gone ahead. Zaynab walked with the driver, speaking in low tones that did not carry. Averroes followed at a measured distance.

Aisha slowed.

She had noticed him earlier, though she had not turned to confirm it. The rhythm of his steps was uneven, not from uncertainty, but from adjustment—each movement recalibrated around an absence.

When she finally stopped, he did as well.

For a moment, neither spoke. The sky had not yet begun to lighten, but the darkness had softened. Forms were visible again, though without detail. The world existed, but without commitment.

"You left the city," she said.

It was not a question.

Saladin shifted his weight slightly, the movement small but deliberate.

"The city left me first," he said.

His voice was lower than she expected. Not quiet—contained.

Aisha nodded once, as if this confirmed something she had already decided.

They stood side by side, not facing each other, looking instead toward the faint line of the road ahead.

"You saw it," she said. "At the fountain."

"Yes."

"And the fire."

"Yes."

She waited.

"And?" she asked.

Saladin did not answer immediately. He looked down at his sleeve—the empty fold pinned neatly where his arm had once extended. His remaining hand adjusted it unconsciously, as if correcting something that could no longer be corrected.

"It worked," he said.

She turned slightly toward him.

"That is not the same as being real."

"No," he said. "But it is the same as being believed."

The distinction settled between them, not argued, not resolved.

"You are coming north," she said.

Again, not a question.

"Yes."

"Why?"

This time, he did look at her.

"For the same reason you are," he said.

She almost smiled.

"That is not an answer."

"It is enough," he said.

She held his gaze a moment longer, then looked away, back toward the road.

Behind them, a faint sound—Averroes calling her name, not loudly, just enough to mark distance.

"Do you think it changes anything?" Saladin asked.

"What?"

"That they were false."

She considered this carefully.

"It changes what can be said," she said. "And who cannot deny it."

He let out a short breath. Not quite a laugh.

Only then did she speak again.

"It is not about who cares," she said. "It is about what continues."

He walked beside her now, their pace matched without negotiation.

"And this continues?" he asked.

"For now," she said.

The first light began to gather at the edge of the horizon, thin and colorless. Shapes resolved into edges, edges into surfaces.

"Does it get easier?" he asked, after a while.

Aisha shook her head.

"No," she said. "It becomes clearer."

He absorbed this, then nodded once.

"That is worse," he said.

"Yes," she replied.

They walked on. For a time, their shadows moved separately across the uneven ground, stretched thin by the rising light.

Then, as the sun cleared the horizon, the shadows shortened, drew closer, and—without merging—began to overlap.

Neither of them remarked on it.

They followed it together.

La Transmisión

No fue el texto lo que viajó.

O no solamente.

Lo que se desplazaba de un lugar a otro no era una obra terminada, ni un argumento cerrado, sino algo más inestable: una forma de continuar hablando sin garantizar el mismo sentido.

En el puerto, las cajas se abrían con una mezcla de prisa y descuido. Los nombres se repetían en voz alta, pero cada repetición los alteraba ligeramente.

—¿Esto dice “Ibn Rushd”? —preguntó uno de los cargadores.

—Eso parece —respondió otro—. O algo parecido.

El escriba tomó el documento, frunció el ceño, y volvió a trazar las letras con tinta fresca. No corregía. Ajustaba.

A unos pasos de distancia, Aisha observaba sin intervenir. Había aprendido que la transmisión no dependía de la fidelidad, sino de la continuidad. Un error no detenía el proceso. A veces lo hacía posible.

Saladín estaba junto a ella, mirando las cajas como si intentara entender qué parte de aquello realmente importaba.

—Si cambian los nombres —dijo—, ¿no cambia también lo que significan? Aisha tardó en responder.

—Sí —dijo finalmente—. Pero no necesariamente deja de funcionar.

Un hombre pasó junto a ellos cargando un volumen mal cerrado. Algunas hojas se deslizaron y cayeron al suelo. Nadie se detuvo de inmediato. El hombre siguió caminando. Otro recogió una de las hojas, la miró brevemente, y la colocó en la pila equivocada.

Aisha lo vio. No dijo nada.

—¿No vas a corregirlo? —preguntó Saladín.

Ella negó.

—No puedo corregir todo —dijo—. Y no todo necesita ser corregido.

—Entonces, ¿cómo sabes qué importa?

Aisha lo miró por primera vez directamente.

—No lo sé —dijo—. Lo descubro viendo qué sobrevive.

El ruido del puerto aumentó a medida que el día avanzaba. Voces en diferentes lenguas se cruzaban sin necesidad de coincidir. Nada completamente estable. Nada completamente perdido.

Saladín se inclinó y recogió una hoja que el viento había empujado hacia sus pies. La sostuvo con cuidado.

—¿Puedes leer esto? —preguntó.

Aisha se acercó. Observó la página. Las palabras le resultaban familiares, pero no exactas. Habían cambiado. O quizá ella había cambiado.

—Sí —dijo—. Creo que sí.

—¿Y significa lo mismo?

Aisha dudó. Luego negó suavemente.

—No exactamente.

Saladín asintió, como si esa fuera la única respuesta que tenía sentido.

Doblando la hoja, la colocó de nuevo entre las otras. No en su lugar original. En uno posible.

El trabajo continuó. Las cajas se cerraron. Los nombres fueron escritos otra vez. Y otra vez cambiaron.

Al final del día, nada estaba exactamente donde había comenzado.

Y sin embargo, nada se había detenido.

Eso, pensó Aisha, era suficiente.

יִתְיָאֲרֵךְ לֵאלֹהֵי נַדָּר

Intercalatio: De Arbore et Volatu

The tree stands slightly apart from the others, not isolated, but with enough space around it that its full shape can be taken in at once. Its trunk rises with a gradual, almost hesitant widening at the base, as if it had once adjusted itself to the ground and then decided to remain. The bark is not uniform. In some places it lies flat and close, smooth enough to reflect a dull sheen of light, while in others it lifts in thin plates, curling at the edges, exposing a darker layer beneath. There are shallow fissures running vertically, not deep enough to divide, but enough to suggest a slow and continuous separation that never completes.

The branches begin higher than expected. For several feet the trunk is uninterrupted, a column that holds itself without deviation, and then, almost all at once, the structure opens. Limbs extend outward in uneven directions, not symmetrically, but with a balance that only becomes apparent when seen as a whole.

Leaves gather densely toward the outer portions of the canopy. Up close, they are small and irregular, each one slightly different in shape, but from a distance they merge into a continuous surface that filters the light into a shifting pattern below. The wind moves through them without urgency. It does not pass evenly. Certain clusters respond first, trembling in place, while others remain still for a moment longer, and then follow, as though the motion were being transmitted through an unseen delay.

The ground beneath the tree is worn, though not barren.

For a while, nothing happens.

Then, without warning or preparation, the first bird arrives.

It does not descend gradually. It appears in motion already committed, wings adjusting only at the last moment, the body angling to meet a particular branch. The landing is precise but not delicate. The branch dips slightly under the added weight, then returns, oscillating once before settling. The bird holds still, head turning once, quickly, as if verifying its position.

A second bird follows, then a third, not in a coordinated pattern, but not entirely independent either. They arrive from different directions, but within a narrow span of time that suggests a shared decision made elsewhere.

Soon there are many.

They do not fill the tree evenly. Certain branches collect them, forming dense lines of bodies facing roughly the same direction, while other branches remain empty, not avoided, but not chosen. Their motion does not cease after landing. It changes form.

The sound begins after the settling.

At first it is intermittent, individual calls that do not align. Then it thickens, not into a unified chorus, but into a field of overlapping signals. No single call dominates, yet none are entirely lost. The result is not noise, exactly, but something structured at a level that resists immediate parsing.

One bird leaves.

Its departure is abrupt, the inverse of its arrival. It pushes off, wings opening into the space it had just occupied, and is gone before the surrounding birds have fully responded. The branch lifts slightly in its absence. For a moment, there is a small gap where it had been, a visible interruption in the line.

Another bird moves into that space.

Not immediately, and not by direct intention that can be observed, but the gap does not remain.

The birds remain for a time that is neither brief nor extended enough to establish a rhythm. Then, as without warning as they arrived, they begin to leave.

Not all at once.

One, then another, then several in quick succession. The branches lighten incrementally. The sound thins. The structure that had formed dissolves without reversing itself. There is no final departure, no last bird that marks the end.

At some point, the tree is simply empty again.

It is not the same as before.

Nothing visible has changed. The bark is as it was. The branches hold their positions. The leaves continue to move with the wind.

And yet the space retains a trace of the arrangement that occupied it, not as a visible residue, but as a condition that could recur.

The tree stands.

It does not anticipate.

It does not remember.

But the possibility remains, suspended in the same way the leaves hold light, waiting for nothing in particular, and for that reason, available to everything that might arrive.

Drip.

לִי וְלִי וְלִי וְלִי וְלִי וְלִי וְלִי וְלִי

Interludium: De Insula Animalium

There was once a fox who found himself alone on an island.

He did not remember arriving. He remembered the water, and then the absence of it, and then the sand.

At first, he believed the island to be empty. This belief was sufficient for several days. He walked its length, which did not change, and its width, which did not increase, and concluded that nothing lived there but himself.

He began, therefore, to arrange the place. He gathered shells into lines, not because they needed arranging, but because arrangement made the island easier to traverse. He marked a path between two stones, though the path had already existed in his movement. He returned to the same place repeatedly until it began to resemble a center.

On the fifth day, he discovered tracks. They did not resemble his own. They were smaller, and deeper at the front, as though the creature that made them carried its weight differently.

He followed them. This was not a decision.

The tracks led to a clearing he had already visited, though not in the same configuration. There, beneath a bent tree, he found a tortoise. The tortoise did not appear surprised.

You have been here for some time, said the fox.

The tortoise did not answer immediately. This delay did not indicate hesitation.

I have been here long enough, the tortoise said.

The fox considered this. It was not an answer to his question, but it did not contradict it.

They began, without agreement, to share the island. The fox continued to move. The tortoise continued to remain.

Between them, paths formed. Some of these paths were used by both. Some were not.

The fox attempted, at first, to explain the island. He described its boundaries, its resources, the places where water could be found after rain.

The tortoise listened without interrupting.

You speak as though the island were fixed, said the tortoise.

The fox did not immediately understand.

It is fixed enough, he replied.

The tortoise did not disagree.

Days passed, though not always in sequence. The fox built a shelter. The tortoise did not. The shelter held. It held because the fox returned to it. It did not hold for the tortoise.

At some point, though neither could identify when, the fox ceased to think of the island as

De Continuitate Apparente

In the absence of any remaining global constraint that would enforce a single interpretive frame, the system does not collapse but instead redistributes its requirements across the local structure of the page. What had previously been experienced as instability becomes, under sufficient exposure, a condition of ordinary operation. The reader does not resolve this condition but rather adapts to it, supplying continuity where none is guaranteed and tolerating divergence where none can be eliminated.

This adaptation does not occur through error correction in the conventional sense. No external standard is reintroduced, and no prior state is recovered. Instead, the reader develops a capacity to traverse multiple representations of the same underlying structure without requiring them to coincide. In this way, inconsistency ceases to function as a signal of failure and becomes instead a mode of persistence, allowing the system to continue operating even in the absence of equivalence between its components.

At this point, it is no longer meaningful to distinguish between what is preserved and what is altered, since preservation itself has come to depend upon the capacity to tolerate alteration. The system therefore maintains itself not by enforcing identity, but by permitting sufficient compatibility among its elements to allow continued traversal. This compatibility is never complete, but it is always enough.

The consequence is that continuation no longer requires justification. The page does not need to prove that it is coherent in order to be read, nor does it need to establish that its statements can be reconciled within a single consistent framework. It proceeds, instead, by allowing each statement to persist alongside those that contradict it, without collapsing into silence or resolving into a final synthesis.

This is not a resolution. It is not even a stable equilibrium in the classical sense. It is, rather, a condition in which the absence of resolution no longer prevents continuation. The system remains operative precisely because it does not require its own completion, and because each of its elements is able to function without being fully determined by the others.

For this reason, the distinction between consistency and inconsistency becomes increasingly difficult to maintain, not because the system has achieved perfect coherence, but because the criteria by which coherence would be measured no longer apply uniformly across its structure. What persists is not agreement, but the capacity to continue in the presence of disagreement, and to do so without requiring that disagreement be eliminated.

In this sense, the system does not end. It becomes indistinguishable from the conditions under which it is read, and therefore continues wherever those conditions can be reproduced. What remains is not a conclusion, but a mode of operation that no longer depends on the possibility of closure.
